Please note: Cats are great at hiding dental pain! Some cats show NO signs of dental disease, when in fact they are in quite a bit of pain! This is another important reason to see your veterinarian for regular wellness visits.

February is National Pet Dental Health Month and a great time to “brush up” on your cat’s oral care.

If your cat has painful teeth, tartar, and/or gingivitis or if you’ve noticed a foul odor coming from your cat’s mouth, its teeth should be professionally cleaned before you begin a home-care routine. Read more about dental care for cats at www.catvets.com/cat-owners/caring-for-cats/dental-care

You should seek professional dental care if your cat has:

- Painful areas around his mouth or he refuses to eat.
- Excessive drooling (ptyalism).
- Grinding teeth (bruxism): Many people describe this as their cat “chewing on a bone.”
- Abnormally red gums (gingivitis).
- Only chews on one side of his mouth, or drops food while eating.
- Tartar (hard deposits of material that forms on teeth at the gum line).
- A foul odor coming from his mouth.
